Streets of this border town of 14,000 were almost deserted yesterday afternoon except for patroling bands of armed men. At dusk, Gen. Gomez took the Latin method of relieving the tension. He

The word soon spread that the governor was strolling, and the more venturesome residents began emerging into the streets. By the time Gomez had taken a half dozen turns about the plaza there were several senoritas on the walks. In accordance with the custom, the young men took up the promenade in an opposite direction to the senoritas, alert for the favors of as it should be again, despite the forms of soldiers and police lurking along the darker corners.

Situation Controlled at least four were killed in the demonstration here yesterday, and more in other parts of the state. The situation obviously was under control here, but Gomez tacitly recognized the attitude of tenseness by saying that "it would be a day or two before the uprising is completely quelled."

Three famous detectives, Lord Simon. M. Picon and Monsignor Smith, are investigating the murder of Mrs. Mary Thurston, middle-aged wife of a retired English physician who has been found slain in bed during a week-end party at the Thurston home near London. Those in the house when Mrs. Thurston retired were her husband. Townsend, the author; Williams, the family lawyer; Strickland, a sportsman, and the servants. Three piercing screams preceded the discovery of the tragedy. Mrs. Thurston's bedroom door was bolted from the unside and the only open window revealed a 20-foot drop to the ground. Monday Club Program Is Presented by Trio

Music of Masters Played Before Members

The Peters, Downing, Hartley Trio, of Columbus, presented a program of music before members of the Monday club and a few guests at the regular meeting in NEBRASKA GRANGE, THE the Library Trustees' room of Memorial Hall.

As Josef Weiss has said, "Music should be described only when it is absolutely necessary. If the music is bad, then it does not pay. If it is good, then it does not need it. The artist should become a man of great ideals through his art."

The opening number, Opus 70, No. 1, Beethoven, was vivacious, it was played with cleanness of touch and accuracy. The second movement carried a plaintive theme, beautifully played by the trio. This is known as the "Ghost Trio." The third movement was again vivacious, though with fine feeling and expression in carrying the theme.

The Trio in G. Minor, Opus 3, by Chausson, was play by the three ladies with magnitude of execution. Miss Peters, at the piano, made a fine background for the other players, who showed great ability with their ease and sureness of touch.

Ernest Chausson was a French composer, born about the middle of the 19th century.

The third number of the program was Trio, Opus 101, by Brahms, in four movements. The first was a bright marshal air played with much expression. The second, a melodious theme, was beautifully executed. In the third movement, the piano repeats the theme already played by violin and violin cello, bringing out its true beauty in finishing together. The fourth movement brought full rich tones from each instrument into a fitting and beautiful finale.

In quoting from a biographer, he says, "I go so far as to say that the art of correct delivery in Beethoven's own manner is perhaps altogether lost. But few possess the key to the secret of reproducing Beethoven's music in its purity and greatness. His instrumentation is altogether richer in tone quality than is Brahms'. To this day some of Beethoven's works are not universally under-

Another biographer says, "Not a single note among the million which Brahms has written down exists for the purpose of effect alone. In his character as in his genius, Brahms is very closely related to the Scandinavian spirit, the type of Ibsen and the Northern school. In spite of the cosmopolitan style of his music, Brahms is today the composer of common songs of the German people."

As Josef Weiss has said, "Music should be described only when it is absolutely necessary. If the music s bad, then it does not pay. If it s good, then it does not need it. The artist should become a man of great ideals through his art." The opening number, Opus 70, No. 1, Beethoven, was vivacious, it was played with cleanness of touch and accuracy. The second movement carried a plaintive theme, beautifully played by the trio. This is known as the "Ghost Trio." The third movement was again vivacious, though with fine feeling and expression in carrying the theme. The Trio in G. Minor, Opus 3, by Chausson, was play by the three ladies with magnitude of execution. Miss Peters, at the piano, made a fine background for the other players, who showed great ability with their ease and sureness of touch. Ernest Chausson was a French composer, born about the middle of the 19th century

The third number of the program was Trio, Opus 101, by Brahms, in four movements. The first was a bright marshal air played with much expression. The second, a melodious theme, was beautifully executed. In the third movement, the piano repeats the theme already played by violin and violin cello, bringing out its true beauty in finishing together. The fourth movement brought full rich tones from each instrument into a fitting and beautiful finale.

In quoting from a biographer, he the art of correct delivery in Beethoven's own manner is perhaps altogether lost. But few possess the key to the secret of reits purity and greatness. His instrumentation is altogether richer in tone quality than is Brahms'. To this day some of Beethoven's works are not universally under-songs of the German people." "Brahms is the musician's poet, just as Spenser is the poets' poet.

In spite of the cosmopolitan style of his music, Brahms is today the composer of common
